Scientists have long __(6)__ the incredible diversity within a species. But they thought it reflected evolutionary changes that unfolded imperceptibly, over millions of years. That __(7)__ between populations within a species was enforced, according to Ernst Mayr, the great evolutionary biologist of the 1940s, when a population was separated from the rest of the species by a mountain range or a desert, preventing breeding across the divide over geologic scales of time. Without the separation, gene flow was __(8)__. But as the separation persisted, the isolated population grew apart and speciation occurred.

In the mid-1960s, the biologist Paul Ehrlich – author of The Population Bomb (1968) – and his Stanford University colleague Peter Raven challenged Mayr's ideas about speciation. They had __(9)__ checkerspot butterflies living in the Jasper Ridge Biological Preserve in California, and it soon became clear that they were not examining a single population. Through years of capturing, marking and then recapturing the butterflies, they were able to prove that within the population, spread over just 50 acres of suitable checkerspot habitat, there were three groups that rarely interacted __(10)__ their very close proximity.

Among other ideas, Ehrlich and Raven argued in a now classic paper from 1969 that gene flow was not as __(11)__ and ubiquitous as Mayr and his cohort maintained, and thus evolutionary divergence between neighbouring groups in a population was probably common. They also __(12)__ that isolation and gene flow were less important to evolutionary divergence than natural selection (when factors such as mate choice, weather, disease or predation cause better-adapted individuals to survive and pass on their successful genetic traits). For example, Ehrlich and Raven __(13)__ that, without the force of natural selection, an isolated population would remain unchanged and that, in other scenarios, natural selection could be __(14)__ enough to __(15)__ gene flow.

Directions: Read the passage carefully and answer the following questions.

1. Three teenagers—two soldiers and a civilian—were among the 50 million or more estimated casualties of the 1918 influenza A pandemic. However, unlike most people who were killed by the virus, the lungs of the three were saved, preserved in formalin for more than one hundred years. Now, according to a preprint uploaded to bioRxiv on May 14, these organs are providing genetic clues as to why the virus took so many lives, Science reports.

The 1918 pandemic, a zoonotic disease thought to have jumped into people from birds, was one of the deadliest pandemics on record. Especially lethal were the second and third waves of cases, which occurred starting in the fall of that year. It's likely that variants of the virus played a role in the differing damage caused by each wave. Unfortunately, obtaining viral RNA sequences from samples that old is technically fraught. In fact, until recently, extracting RNA from century-old specimens would have been considered "a fantasy," Hendrik Poinar, an ancient DNA scientist at McMaster University who was not involved in the study, tells Science.

Even obtaining samples is hard, preprint co-author Michael Worobey, an evolutionary biologist at the University of Arizona, tells Science. Still, the team was able to secure a total of 13 lung tissue samples from people who died between 1900 and 1931 from specimens that were being housed in the Berlin Museum of Medical History and the pathology collection of the Natural History Museum in Vienna; three of them, all from 1918, contained influenza RNA.

While the RNA was highly fragmented, the team was able to reconstruct between 60 and 90 percent of the genomes of the viruses that killed the two soldiers, and the entire genome of the virus that killed the civilian. The new sequences are all from the first wave of the pandemic, and when compared with the previously described strains from later on in the pandemic, they hint at how the virus may have become deadlier. For example, the two partial genomes from the soldiers contain sequences that are more “bird-like,” reports Science—a sign that early versions of the virus may have had more difficulty infecting people.

Most telling, though, was the whole genome. In cell cultures, the complex from the first wave virus constructed RNA at roughly half the efficiency of the virus from a later wave.

“The fact that you can test, in vitro, the effects of an ‘extinct’ strain has huge implications in understanding evolution of virulence and possible countermeasures should we encounter another flu epidemic,” Poinar tells Science.

“It’s absolutely fantastic work,” he adds. “The researchers have made reviving RNA viruses from archival material an achievable goal.”

Direction:- Read the following passage carefully and answer the questions given below it.

Certain words/ Phrases have been printed in bold to help you locate them while answering some of the questions.

Social audio apps are a new kind of platforms that have gained prominence after Clubhouse became popular. The app was catapulted to fame after it hosted Tesla’s CEO Elon Musk, and Facebook’s Mark Zuckerberg in separate sessions. Last March, Clubhouse was launched in beta as an invitation-only application, and three months later, it was generally made available to all iOS users.

Since June, the app has enabled several people to connect, congregate and discuss on its platform. Unlike other social media platforms, Clubhouse and its tribe of audio apps provide their users, fatigued by video-calls and meetings during the pandemic, a chance to connect sans camera. They help drive real-time voice conversations à la erstwhile conference calls. According to app analytics firms App Annie, Clubhouse app was downloaded over 9.6 million times in February alone.

While Clubhouse is the first app of its kind, other platforms are starting to experiment their own version of audio apps. Facebook introduced new audio and podcast features to its app last month. Reddit launched 'Reddit Talk' last month, and messaging app Telegram rolled out a similar feature. Twitter has launched its own audio feature. Called Spaces, the sub-platform is available within the Twitter app, alongside its recently launched Fleets feature. The micro-blogging site has a slightly different approach when it comes to how people can join conversations on Spaces. Unlike Clubhouse's invite-only chat rooms, Spaces allows Twitter users to join impromptu discussions hosted by those they follow. On the Fleets sections, they will be able to view active discussion that they can click to join and listen in. The intimacy of voice adds a layer of empathy to conversations, making way for nuance, emotion, and meaning that are often lost in text.

Audio apps have been adopted by a range of users, including stock traders, content creators and musicians, as the medium is convenient and flexible to interact with others globally. These video-free conversations cuts down the anxiety and pressure of being on camera. Moreover, according to a Reddit blog, live audio talk can be "more fun" than video or text chats. To this end, the platform will soon allow users to customise the look of the interface through emojis, background wallpapers and speaker profiles.

India is said to be an early adopter in audio apps with a fifth of users keen on using the technology in its current form, according to a study by research firm YouGov. Both Clubhouse and Twitter Spaces are already seeing growth amongst Indian users, ranging from screenwriters to entrepreneurs. Several Indian startups, including Fireside, Bakstage and Headfone, too, have rolled out audio-only chat apps. The presence of different languages and a rich oral tradition in India shows "huge potential" for the growth of audio interactions.

Just like in contemporary social media, audio apps also face content moderation challenge. The explosive growth has drawn scrutiny over how the apps will handle problematic content, from hate speech to harassment and misinformation. Moreover, tools to detect problematic audio content lag behind those used to identify text, further deepening the crisis, Reuters had reported.

Social apps will also have to focus on how their users can monetise from the platforms, app analytics firm Sensor Tower noted in a blog post. Twitter Spaces plans to allow hosts to sell tickets on the platform, paving way for subscription-based audio shows.
